Fact Sheet about The Revised 1990 Census Counts

The Census Bureau has received correspondence and other types of inquiries from local governments and other census data users about the 1990 census counts. In an effort to be responsive, we have answered both generalized and specific questions regarding the 1990 census counts. As appropriate, the Census Bureau reviewed information provided by local officials and other census data users to resolve their questions.

In some instances, our review for an individual government identified specific error(s) in the 1990 census records. The vast majority of the errors we identified are geographic errors. Geographic errors involve inaccuracies in the local government's boundaries recognized for tabulating the census results or in the geographic assignment of individual living quarters and their associated population. The enclosed statement reflects the corrections resulting from our review of the 1990 census records based on questions received on behalf of an individual local government.

Some local governments are receiving this statement of revised census counts even though they did not contact the Census Bureau about their 1990 census counts. These changes to the census counts generally reflect the reassignment of living quarters and associated population made around the legal boundary between two or more jurisdictions as the result of an inquiry received. That is, our review of the 1990 census records determined that specific living quarters and their associated population required reassignment from one local government unit to another.
